Pause recommended for wind, but not sequestration

By BAILEY CLINE
The Commercial Review

Jay County Plan Commission recommended enacting a one-year moratorium on wind farms Thursday.

The commission also recommended not to enact a moratorium on geological carbon sequestration projects — specifically those dealing with injecting carbon dioxide into the ground — at the same meeting.

The final decision on both issues will be up to Jay County Commissioners.

Renewable energy company RWE Clean Energy, a subsidiary of electricity company RWE Group, is planning to construct a 200-megawatt wind farm in Jay County. Hopes are for the wind farm to be operational in 2031.

Representatives of the company spoke at Thursday's public hearing regarding a potential moratorium on wind farms.

Jason Winik, lead development manager for the proposed project in Jay County, explained the facility would bring in an estimated $75 million in tax revenue to the county over its roughly 35-year life cycle.

Winik noted the company, along with former Jay County resident and land agent John Myron, started reaching out to some landowners and commissioners last year. He pointed out the project is in its early stages.

"We want to talk to neighbors, decision makers, large landowners, small landowners, you know, just normal residents, supporters of the opposition, the loudest voices, we want to sit down and have a conversation with them," he said. "Ultimately we're here to work with you, whether it's to revise an ordinance, to talk about the existing one, we just ask to be part of that conversation."

Rural Portland resident Ed Nixon spoke against a moratorium, saying he believes the current ordinance is adequate.

Plan commission president Scott Hilfiker reiterated the moratorium won't put an end to wind farms in Jay County forever.

"I don't think anybody here is against the wind (ordinance), what we have, we just need to tweak it a little bit," he said.

Tasty Thursday

Modified IU board makes changes

By MADELYN HANES

A newly constituted Indiana University Board of Trustees on Thursday changed the school's protest policy related to a federal lawsuit after Gov. Mike Braun's three new appointees were sworn in.

Other topics included new degree programs, tuition and fees, and a legislative update.

The governor recently removed three alumni-elected board members in favor of his own appointees after lawmakers gave him the new powers earlier this year. Two IU alumni silently held signs at the back of the room, urging President Pamela Whitten to sign a resolution by the American Association of Colleges and Universities condemning political interference in higher education. A third alum joined, standing for the entire session in protest of state overreach into university governance.

The public meeting, held on IU Bloomington's campus, began with the swearing in of Braun's newly appointed trustees — conservative attorney James Bopp, Jr. and attorney Brian Eagle.

"Now that we have you, let's put you to work," said Board Chairman Quinn Buckner.

The American Civil Liberties Union of Indiana has filed multiple lawsuits against IU over the last year. One of those challenged IU's expressive activity policy, claiming the time restrictions on when students can protest violate the First Amendment.

IU's general counsel said they incorporated feedback from the university and the judge overseeing the lawsuit to make new amendments. The board unanimously passed the changes made to the policy, although the exact amendments were not discussed.

Israel attacks Iran nuclear sites

Apparent retaliatory strikes came later on Friday

By MARISSA NEWMAN and ARSALAN SHAHLA

Israel launched strikes across Iran on Friday morning, targeting nuclear facilities and killing top military commanders in a major escalation against its chief adversary that risks sparking a broad war in the Middle East.

The strikes were far more extensive than those Israel carried out against Iran last year and underscored the country's growing assertiveness, as well as its military and intelligence capabilities.

Iran appeared to launch a retaliatory barrage of missiles later Friday, according to the Israel Defense Forces, who said in a statement that "all of Israel" was under fire. Plumes of smoke could be seen over Tel Aviv on Friday evening. Iran did not immediately comment on the action.

U.S. President Donald Trump urged Iran to accept a nuclear deal with Washington to avoid further attacks, which Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu vowed would probably happen over the coming days as Israel looks to deal a severe blow to Tehran's nuclear program.

"There is still time to make this slaughter, with the next already planned attacks being even more brutal, come to an end," Trump said on Truth Social. Tehran must make a deal "before it is too late," he said.

Israel said it struck around 100 targets across Iranian cities on Friday morning, using 200 planes. The attacks caused oil to surge as much as 13%, though it later pared its gains, and investors to buy havens such as gold and US Treasuries.

Weather

The high temperature hit 80 degrees Friday in Jay County. The low was 69.

There is a 70% chance of rain today with thunderstorms possible. The high will be in the upper 70s. Sunday's high will be in the upper 70s and Monday's high will be in the lower 80s. There is a slight chance of rain both days.

Explosions were heard across Tehran, Natanz — home to a key atomic site — and other cities, according to local and social media. Loud explosions were also observed near Iran’s Fordow nuclear site, where the country was enriching uranium to near-bomb grade, according to Fars News. Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu said Israel “struck at the heart of Iran’s nuclear-enrichment program.”

The head of the Islamic Revolutionary Guard Corps, Hossein Salami, and the military’s chief of staff, Mohammad Bagheri, were both killed, according to Iranian media. At least two other senior IRGC members also died.

Iran quickly responded by sending a wave of drones toward Israel, though it was unclear if they caused any damage. Some were intercepted over Jordan.

Israel expects Iran to retaliate with more drone strikes and also by firing ballistic missiles, according to a military official speaking on condition of anonymity.

“The risk of this conflict expanding is real,” said Bilal

Bassiouni, head of risk forecasting at advisory firm Pangea-Risk. “Iran is under intense pressure to respond beyond drones, and a strike on Israeli military or strategic infrastructure, including energy or nuclear-linked facilities, is plausible.”

The UN’s atomic watchdog said there were no indications of increased radiation levels at Iran’s main uranium-enrichment site of Natanz, an early sign the strikes haven’t penetrated the layers of steel and concrete protecting the Islamic Republic’s nuclear stockpile.

The Israeli Air Force said the Natanz strike hit an underground multi-story chamber with centrifuges and other infrastructure, causing “significant damage.”

Netanyahu said the strikes “will continue for as many days as it takes to remove this threat.” Israel’s U.N. ambassador said it was possible that the operation takes weeks.

Beyond nuclear facilities, the initial phase of the strikes targeted Iran’s air defenses and missile-production facilities.

Iranian media said at least 95 people were wounded and that several residential buildings in the capital’s suburbs were hit. Iran hasn’t yet released an official death toll.

Netanyahu said Friday’s strikes were “very successful,” adding that Israelis would need to prepare for a retaliation and prepare to spend long periods in shelters.

Iran’s Supreme Leader Ayatollah Ali Khamenei said Israel will “pay a very heavy price” and should “expect a severe response from Iran’s armed forces.”

Several countries closed their airspace, including Israel, Iran, Iraq, Syria and Jordan.

Jay/Portland Building and Planning director John Hemmelgarn said he's heard concerns about future wind projects in Jay County and the current wind farm ordinance. He suggested a moratorium to give officials time to take a step back and review the ordinance, potentially taking a closer look at setback limits for wind turbines.

County attorney Wes Schemenaur noted he would also like to review the template for decommissioning agreements.

Plan commission member and Jay County Council president Matt Minnich questioned how long it may take to adjust the ordinance, with Schemenaur hesitating to commit to a time frame but estimating it could be done in six months.

Answering a question from Minnich, Winik estimated it will take another couple years until the company files for a permit.

There are currently two wind farms in Jay County — Bitter Ridge Wind Farm and Bluff Point Wind Energy Center — that will not be impacted by a moratorium.

Minnich questioned if there were other prospective wind farms coming to Jay County, with Hemmelgarn saying RWE Clean Energy’s project is the only one he knows of at this time.

The plan commission then agreed to recommend Jay County Commissioners enact a one-year moratorium on wind farms in Jay County, with Minnich dissenting.

Also Thursday, the plan commission recommended commissioners not enact a one-year moratorium on geological carbon sequestration projects in Jay County.

Hemmelgarn noted the moratorium discussed Thursday would impact carbon sequestration projects specifically dealing with injecting carbon dioxide into the ground.

There are currently two carbon sequestration projects in the works in Jay County. They include a proposed biochar manufacturing facility — it involves converting egg layer and pullet manure into soil amendment products — from Minnich Eggs and a Class 6 well project from ethanol facility POET Bioprocessing. The latter process would involve drilling nearly 4,000 feet below the surface and injecting carbon dioxide — it’s a byproduct from creating ethanol — into the well over the next several years.

Adam Homan, general manager of POET Bioprocessing, said the project is a $50 million investment.

“This project for us, this (carbon capture and sequestration) project, is just another way to create value out of that corn kernel,” he said.

The business is currently capturing and selling about 25% its carbon dioxide. With carbon sequestration, he explained, POET Bioprocessing could tap into new markets, such as aviation and marine fuel.

He said the company’s future could be at stake if it didn’t pursue the project and asked for the county not to enact a moratorium on carbon sequestration.

Mark Henning, a petroleum geologist with DTE Vantage, noted testing his company has completed on POET Bioprocessing’s property and in the surrounding area to ensure the land is suitable for the project, saying Jay County’s geology allows for safely conducting carbon sequestration. He also pointed to Environmental Protection Agency and Indiana Department of Natural Resources regulations and asked plan commission not to recommend enacting a moratorium.

A few neighboring landowners also voiced support for the project, saying they wouldn’t have signed on if they felt it were unsafe.

Hemmelgarn asked Homan and Henning a series of questions, including about the project’s size — the carbon dioxide “plume” is forecasted to span 2,500 acres.

He pointed to salt water currently sitting in space deep underground, questioning if it could be pushed up into the county’s water table through a crack. Henning noted a 2D seismic survey showed no faults or fractures in the earth, with Hemmelgarn interjecting that there is always a possibility one could appear. Henning said in the unlikely situation the county’s water were tainted, per EPA’s rules, wells would be drilled for extraction and those affected would receive new water sources.

Minnich and plan commission member Jeanne Houchins suggested the county follow federal and state guidelines already in place.

“I don’t think we can do better than what the EPA is going to do,” said Houchins.

Several plan commission members spoke in opposition of a moratorium, with some pointing out they had met with POET Bioprocessing recently to learn more about carbon sequestration and the project as a whole.

Houchins recommended POET Bioprocessing host an educational meeting to inform the public about its project, with Homan saying there has been discussion about the educational aspect.

Plan commission then recommended, with Steve Ford dissenting, that commissioners not enact a moratorium on carbon sequestration.

Felony arrests

Court violations

A Portland woman was arrested Thursday for violating her probation and failing to appear in court.

Heather R. Best, 40, 1015 W. North St., pleaded guilty in Jay Circuit Court in April 2021 to possession of methamphetamine, a Level 4 felony.

She was sentenced to eight years in Indiana Department of Correction with four years suspended and given credit for time served. A notice alleging she violated the conditions of her probation was filed in court May 20.

In a separate case, she also failed to appear in court June 2. She was charged in Jay Superior Court with a Level 6 felony for possession of methamphetamine and a Class C misdemeanor for possession of paraphernalia.

Best was being held without bond in Jay County Jail.

Grandmother's choice took toll

DEAR ABBY: I am a mother of six and a grand-ma to four. We are a close family and enjoy each other's company. My mom is nearly 80. For reasons I could never understand, she didn't enjoy my children when they were growing up and didn't connect deeply with them.

She once commented to me that she was bored with women her age because they were "obsessed" with their grandchildren and she wanted deeper conversations.

Mom moved away and would mostly visit just for holidays and birthdays. When the children tried to share things that were going on in their lives, she wasn't interested, and we eventually stopped inviting her to sports events and recitals because she seemed annoyed to be there.

Now that her grands have almost reached adulthood, my mother wants to connect with them. She texts them often and sometimes invites them to visit. They respond politely, and a couple have gone to visit her, but none seem interested in a deeper relationship. This bothers her, and she has been asking me to pressure them to visit her and include her in their lives more. But to them, she is a distant relative. They don't feel close to her.

What is my responsibility now? I wish they had a closer relationship with my mom, but I feel awkward telling busy young adults they must plan trips to visit someone who didn't try to establish relationships with them when they were young. Any advice? — TORN DAUGHTER IN WASHINGTON

DEAR DAUGHTER: Your only responsibility is to remind your mother of the truth. When it was time to establish a relationship with her grandchildren, she chose to be absent. Then explain that pressuring them to include her in their lives after she excluded them from hers won't have the desired effect because that ship sailed a long time ago.

Parade will be waste on full display

The Baltimore Sun
Tribune News Service

It is altogether fitting that the nation should honor the 250th anniversary of the United States Army on June 14, 2025. That's a judgment that was shared by the Biden administration, under which planning for the recognition of the Army began.

The United States could not survive without men and women willing to give and risk that last full measure of devotion to defeat foreign enemies. The world is filled with serpents and vultures. The strong do what they can and the weak suffer what they must is the iron law of international relations.

Paying homage to our military, however, should still be informed by moderation. Extravagance should be eschewed. Resources are limited. An equal if not superior way of expressing our gratitude for men and women in the armed forces is generously funding the Department of Veterans Affairs, providing support and compensation for victims of Agent Orange, radiation poisoning or cancer from atomic testing and toxic exposure to burn pits including in Iraq and Afghanistan.

The parade on the National Mall today happens to coincide with President Donald Trump's 79th birthday. Does that coincidence explain the estimated eye-popping $45 million cost? The military takes an oath to support and defend the Constitution of the United States, not the occupant of the White House.

A big chunk of the parade budget will be diverted to street repairs in Washington, D.C. When Pierre Charles L'Enfant designed the street layout of the capital in 1791, he did not envision 120,000-pound M1 Abrams battle tanks rolling down Constitution Avenue. Even with occasional protective metal plates, street damage is likely to reach $16 million.

Memorial Day and Veterans Day holidays already salute those who serve in our armed forces. We should not ape Prussia. It was disparaged as "not a state with an army but an army with a state."

Let us remember that President Abraham Lincoln electrified and inspired the military with his 272-word Gettysburg Address that required nothing other than a brilliant mind and magnanimous character.

Raids forging a potent bond

By NED BARNETT

As people gathered in Los Angeles Monday to protest President Trump's crackdown on undocumented immigrants, others gathered at Raleigh's Moore Square in a show of solidarity.

What was striking about the Raleigh event was the joining of worker rights with immigrant rights. The event was organized by the Union of Southern Services Workers in response to the arrest of David Huerta, president of the Service Employees International Union in California. Huerta was injured and arrested by federal officers on Friday during an immigration enforcement action outside a Los Angeles-area Home Depot. He was released Monday.

and legal issues of immigration, the crackdown may soon affect the labor supply and the economy.

A May jobs survey by NFIB, an advocacy group for small and independent business owners, showed a continuing shortage of workers. About half the businesses responding had openings, mostly in construction, transportation and manufacturing.

Gregg Thompson, NFIB's state director for North Carolina, said in a news release, "Our members say they want to hire and grow their businesses, but there just aren't enough qualified job applicants."

A recent Wall Street Journal editorial included an analysis that found that in the first four months since Trump took office, the nation's immigrant population has been shrinking at a rate of 193,000 people a month. "Fewer immigrants mean fewer workers to fill job openings, so there will be a cost in future growth from the Trump Administration's border closure and deportation roundups," the editorial said.

Marin Baena said the type of raids seen in Los Angeles and elsewhere have not yet hit North Carolina, but there is a rising fear among Latinos. Her group's hot line received 293 calls last week amid "a spike in rumors about ICE sightings."

"The rumors themselves can keep people from going to work or taking their kids to school," she said.

Smith has seen that fear among her co-workers and three Latino families that moved out of her apartment complex abruptly.

"They're scared, terrified. And I don't blame them," she said. "They come thinking they are going to get a better life and now they are not sure what to do."

Creating fear may be the aim of the immigrant raids, but it's also creating a sense of unity among essential workers. If they choose, they could show by their absence how important they are to the economy.

Europeans have long memories

By JOHN KRULL

VIENNA, Austria — Europeans have long memories.

My wife and I had dinner with some folks in this beautiful old city. We ate outdoors, so people moved around the table as the evening stretched out, catching up with each other or, in our case, getting acquainted.

At one point, I found myself seated across from Wolfgang, an energetic, intelligent Austrian entrepreneur.

He asked about our travels. I told him I'd started in Paris, then connected with my wife in Munich. Together, we'd done easy hiking and touring in the Austrian Alps before coming to Vienna.

And when we left Vienna, we would wrap up our trip with a few days at a favorite spot in the Dolomites in northern Italy.

That's when he shook his head. "They used to be Austrian," he said, speaking of the Dolomites.

For a thousand years, he continued, those beautiful mountains had been part of Austria. They became part of Italy in the redrawing of the European map — with its reduction of the Austro-Hungarian Empire — following the tragic events of World War I and World War II.

The spark that lit those two worldwide conflagrations, of course, took place in 1914, when an angry young Serb shot and killed Crown Prince Franz Ferdinand — heir to the Austro-Hungarian throne — and his wife, Sophie. Their murders enabled willful, shortsighted and selfish men to set in motion not one but two wars that nearly ripped the world apart.

Soon, several people at the table began to weigh in.

They said that this ancient connection with Austria is the reason so many people in the Dolomites speak German — with an Austrian accent — rather than Italian as their first language. It is the reason so much of the cuisine in the Dolomites — it is a rare menu in those mountains that does not include schnitzel — is Austrian or German in nature and inspiration. It is the reason so many Austrians and Germans vacation there.

Then they talked about how the creation of the European Union had prompted the Dolomites to drift back into closer relations with Austria. Across Europe, they said, many regions were restoring their ancient affiliations as both travel and trade became easier.

Wolfgang closed the discussion. "For a thousand years," he said, shaking his head slowly, "they were part of Austria."

Yes, Europeans have long memories.

A couple of days later, a heavy rainstorm prompted me to seek shelter in a shop in Vienna's Old Town.

The shopkeeper, a guy about my age, looked at the rain and said there was no point going out in that. He asked if I wanted to join him for a soft drink.

We settled into a comfortable conversation. It turned out that he was a major soccer fan, one who followed teams and players across Europe.

When he learned I was a citizen of the United States, his face lit up.

"You're hosting the World Cup next year!" he said.

He detailed how the World Cup would be contested in the U.S.,

Canada and Mexico in 2026. He gushed about how much excitement, energy and money the globe's greatest soccer tournament would bring to North America.

Then his face darkened. "But it might not be so easy now, right?" he said, alluding to U.S. President Donald Trump's recent spat with Canada and Mexico.

I shrugged my shoulders.

I said the president's determination to pick quarrels with nations that had been our neighbors and friends for generations made little sense to many, even most Americans. I said many Americans — me included — had family members who lived in either Canada or Mexico. The thought that relations with those two countries now were frosty rather than friendly was unpleasant to contemplate.

The shopkeeper shook his head. "It's too bad," he said. "Soccer fans just want to sing and cheer and have a good time."

And he added, when they have a good time, they spend money.

That's why countries want to host the World Cup.

He pursed his lips.

"You know," he said, referring to America's ruptures with Canada and Mexico, "it's not easy to put things back together once they've been torn apart."

The rain had let up.

I thanked him for the soda and conversation.

Outside, I turned back to offer a farewell wave.

He returned it and shook his head again, mournfully.

Yes, Europeans have long memories.

The bidding:

South West North East

Opening lead:

The outcome of many contracts frequently hinges upon how the defenders' cards are divided. A bad break in a suit or the unfavorable location of a particular card can undo many a reasonable contract.

Nevertheless, there are times when declarer can overcome an unlucky lie of the cards by skillful play. These are the hands that appeal most to students of the game.

Consider this deal where South is in six clubs. At first blush, the contract appears to depend on the location of the two missing diamond honors. The obvious approach would seem to be to draw trump and take two diamond finesses through East, hoping he was dealt the king or queen, or both. (As can be seen, this line of play would unluckily fail.)

But, promising as this line of play is, it is not the right way to play the hand. Even though declarer is a 3-to-1 favorite to make the contract in this manner, he should not stake the outcome solely on the luck of the deal.

He can increase his chances substantially by attempting an elimination play to counter the possibility that West has both diamond honors. So, after winning the spade lead with the ace, he trumps a spade. Two rounds of trump are then drawn, ending in dummy.

At this point, having found the opposing clubs divided evenly, declarer can feel 100% certain of the contract. He ruffs the queen of spades and cashes the K-Q-A of hearts, discarding a diamond from his hand.

He now leads the jack of diamonds and lets it ride. West wins but has no safe return. Dummy's remaining four cards are two diamonds and two clubs, while South has three diamonds and one club. West must lead a diamond or hand declarer a ruff-and-discard, and either way, the slam is home.

The bidding:

Opening lead:

Moran let him hold the trick. He then took East's heart return with the ace, led the diamond jack and finessed after West followed low. Had the finesse lost, Moran would have had no trouble scoring 10 tricks regardless of what East returned.

When the diamond jack held, however, the suit became hopelessly blocked. West's king would naturally appear on the next diamond lead, but if Moran won the trick with the ace, he would cut himself off from dummy's remaining diamonds. If instead he permitted the king to hold the trick, West would cash three heart tricks to defeat the contract.

Moran, well known for his imaginative play, decided that his only hope was to enlist West's help. So at trick four he led the nine of hearts! West pounced on this with the ten and, without further thought, cashed the jack of hearts. Moran thereupon discarded his diamond ten, unblocking the suit, and after West took his last heart, the fourth trick for the defense declarer claimed the rest.

West could have thwarted Moran's plan if he had, for example, returned the king of diamonds at trick five instead of cashing the heart jack. The nine-of-hearts play by Moran was a gift horse whose teeth should have been very carefully examined.

Tomorrow: Haste makes waste.

Senior Griffin Byrum finishes season at regional meet

By ANDREW BALKO
The Commercial Review
YORKTOWN — Griffin Bryum put together a strong season for the Patriots’ wrestling team, coming just one match short of the state tournament.
As a state-ranked wrestler in the 113-pound weight class, Byrum knew what to expect from himself and how far he could make it on the mat. When the season changed over, the singlet got hung in the closet and the golf clubs were picked up, Byrum wasn’t exactly certain what his role would be.
After playing for the varsity squad the entire season, Bryum found himself as the only Patriot to advance from the sectional to the regional, but The Players Club and a loaded field was too much for him to advance even further.
Byrum’s season ended at the IHSAA Regional 4 boys golf tournament hosted by Muncie Central at The Players Club on Thursday as the Jay County High School senior finished the round with 110 strokes.

The Commercial Review/Andrew Balko

Jay County High School senior Griffin Byrum follows through on his tee shot at the 14th hole of the IHSAA Regional 4 boys golf meet hosted by Muncie Central at The Players Club on Thursday. Byrum, the only Patriot to qualify for the regional, finished with a score of 110 strokes.

Similar to qualifying from the sectional to the regional meet, only the top three individuals not advancing teams earn berths to the state tournament. Those three spots went to Tommy Klinker of Fishers, who finished second overall with a 1-under-par 71, Eastbrook’s Landon Tropf with a 72 and Tate LaBrune of Heritage Christian, who had to earn his berth with a one-hole playoff after tying with Pendleton Heights’ Vance Jarvis at 74. (Johnny Lehman of Cathedral earned regional match medalist honors with a 70, while Nobelsville’s 295 beat Hamilton Southeastern’s 298 for the regional title.)

“It started out great, but as soon as I started playing bad, I just couldn’t shake the bad play,” Bryum said. “It kept getting worse and worse. But overall, I made it to regionals and played a course I’ll never spend my dimes on but had a good day overall.”
Bryum started off strong with bogeys on the first and second hole, but started to struggle with putting on the third, fourth and fifth. During the stretch, he shot seven-over-par before bouncing back with pars on the sixth and eighth hole and a bogey on the seventh. He had one more hiccup with a triple-bogey on the ninth, giving up 49 strokes at the turn.

For the most part on the front nine, Byrum continued his sectional success with driving the ball and hitting his irons well. He also said he did a better job chipping than he did at Hickory Hills on Tuesday. Putting is what hurt him early in the day as some of the greens retained the morning dew, slowing his putts down causing them to break early, while others were drier and sped right past the hole.

“The greens are really small and if they’re not small, they’re sloped like crazy,” Byrum said. “Up by the greens there’s a lot of bunkers and hills. So the close game is the hardest part in my opinion. The greens are really, really fast, fairways and out of bounds is tight and it’s just overall difficult.”

Byrum started the back nine on a high note as he parred the 388-yard, par-4 tenth hole.
Between the early frustrations with putting, and the physical toll the course demands — The Players Club clocks in at 6,934 yards worth of course with plenty of walking between holes as roads need to be crossed eight times and the green of one hole is directly next to the next tee box only three times — the quality of his tee shots started to deteriorate. He sent his ball out of bounds on the 11th hole for the first time leading to a double-par and never quite recovered mentally.
“You don’t really think about it bothering you too much, but you look back on it and it really does,” Byrum said. “It’s really hard to shake those bad thoughts and the bad play.”
He went out of bounds a handful more times on the back nine, including on the 533-yard, par-5 15th hole that he managed to save for only a double-par. His first shot sailed too far to the right out of bounds, forcing him to retee. His second drive (for his third stroke) ended up in a large pine tree on the right hand side, forcing another stroke on a punch out. Byrum used a fairway wood to put himself just over 100 yards away from the hole, before hitting to within 15 feet of the green and chipping on within three feet. He hit the putt to finish the hole with seven strokes despite the struggles out of the tee box.
In all, Byrum shot 61 on the back nine, leading to the 110. While Byrum wasn’t pleased with his performance, he was able to reflect on the accomplishments of the season and being able to make it to the regional.
“I’m more of a wrestler, so it’s not like I’ve grinded gears to bust my butt to make it to regionals,” Byrum said. “I just never thought I’d make it to regionals. I didn’t really know how anything worked and it was kind of new to me. ... But I’m glad I could say I did.”
